

Currently, airlines are not required to provide medical oxygen. Many regional and some large carriers do not provide this service. Those that do charge a fee that varies by airline. The FAA is now proposing a special regulation to address the traveling needs of persons on oxygen therapy by permitting the use of certain portable oxygen concentrators on aircraft.

When you must reach down deeply for the next breath and/or must have oxygen any effort put forth by FAA and/or air lines is greatly appreciated. This consideration for a large number of oxygen dependent individuals is long over due!!!
The airlines would definitely have MORE passengers.

Thank you for your consideration with regard to AirSep . I would request consideration of Inogen One and EMPTY Helios portables.
